

Airplanes and Safety (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Airplanes and Safety Before aircraft can be extensively utilized for private and commercial purposes and before aerial navigation can be developed to a point where it will afford an attractive field to insurance companies it will be necessary to effect a substantial readjustment of present-day conditions. The public for example will have to acquire a considerable amount of aeronautical knowledge before it will be prepared to admit the practicability of aerial navigation. There is also a crying need for a vastly greater number of official landing fields, laid out and managed in accordance with approved safety principles. It is likewise necessary to establish standard airways duly provided with aerial lighthouses and wireless signal stations; and to pass uniform and stringent laws governing the licensing of pilots the construction and use of air-craft, and the conduct of air-navigation generally. In the present stage of development it is impossible to discuss the subject of Airplanes and Safety exhaustively and fully and the present book does not attempt to do so.
